Bad Justifications

Bad justifications are too generic, don't include specific evidence, and/or summarize the content without any analysis.

Let's review some examples!

Example 1: Too Generic

Contributor Justification

Both responses are equally good because they match the tone and conversation history well. They are nearly identical with slight variations in word choice, but nothing that makes a huge difference in the quality of the response.

Good day! Your latest blood lab results are in. Overall, things are looking positive, but there are a few points we should chat about. When's convenient for you to go over them?

★ You should avoid writing justifications that could apply to multiple tasks. In the example, nothing about the justification indicates that this contributor actually read this specific conversation history! This means there is not enough specificity in the justification.

Example 2: No Evidence

Contributor Justification

Response 6801357924680135 is better than Response 3579246801357924 because it is provides a more detailed and nuanced critique of changes in Cinderella. This helps the user understand the reviewer's perspective more clearly and sounds more fair.

Just watched the new Cinderella movie, and I have to say, it was such a delightful experience! The modern twist on the classic fairy tale brought a fresh energy to the story, and the performances were captivating. Plus, the costumes were absolutely stunning. Definitely a feel-good movie that I'd recommend to anyone looking for a charming escape!

Response 6801357924680135
Checked out the new Cinderella movie. It offered an intriguing modern take on the classic story, but I felt like some of the alterations, such as reimagining the fairy godmother as a fashion designer, didn't quite resonate with me. However, the reinterpretation of the stepsisters as more nuanced characters added depth. The costumes were undeniably impressive, blending contemporary fashion with fairy-tale whimsy, and the soundtrack enhanced the overall atmosphere. Worth watching if you're open to fresh interpretations, but don't expect it to adhere closely to the traditional narrative.

★ Your claims should be well-supported so that any reader can easily understand your perspective and why you have it. This is especially important in supporting your claim when your preference is more subjective.

Nothing beats the joy of baking a cake from scratch! From carefully measuring out ingredients to the delightful aroma wafting through the kitchen as it bakes, every step is a labor of love. And when you finally slice into that moist, fluffy cake and savor the first bite, all the effort feels completely worth it. Baking a cake isn't just about making a dessert; it's about creating memories and sharing moments of sweetness with loved ones."

Whipping up a batch of cupcakes is pure magic in the kitchen! From mixing the batter to watching them rise into adorable little treats in the oven, every step is a delight. And when you top them off with swirls of frosting, sprinkles, or maybe even a surprise filling, they become tiny works of art. Sharing these mini delights with friends and family brings smiles and joy, making every moment spent baking cupcakes a truly sweet experience.

★ Ensure your justifications are an analysis of the responses and not a reiteration of the content. This isn't a high-school essay where you're trying to hit a word count!
