Purpose of a Justification

The purpose of a justification is to let any reader quickly understand why one response is better than the other or why both responses are equal.

A strong justification should have:

Explanation of Rating

A strong justification should clearly explain the reasoning for the rating. This involves stating why one response is better, worse, or equal to another. Begin with this explanation to provide a clear basis for your evaluation.

Citing Specific Evidence

Cite specific evidence from the responses to support your justification. Use unique IDs above each prompt-response pair to reference the responses. Provide precise examples from the text, either as short quotes or paraphrased points, to substantiate your reasoning.

Conciseness

Keep justifications concise, aiming for 3-4 sentences. Long and redundant justifications with irrelevant information are not considered good. If the responses are nearly identical, a shorter justification is acceptable. Conversely, if more detail is needed to convey key points, a slightly longer justification is appropriate.
